

Alec Ross for Shapes

Cyber-threats have proven to be the most significant development in conflict since the weaponization of fissile material. The difference being that the creation of nuclear arms requires the scarcest of scarce scientific talent and trans-uranium elements, but cyber-attacks have a much lower barrier to entry. And I'm trying to show you, with this essay, what to wait for and what to plan for in the next five years.